The cross-platform utility offers you all the required options to store the information about people you need to dial. What We Liked: The app is free of charge and light on the resources, making it a safe choice for everyone. The application is pretty affordable, as well. The user interface is kept simple, but it is functional. What We Didn't Like: There are no advanced features offered by the program, such as supporting the exporting of contacts to a file or automatically sending an email message. An often overlooked part of every android application is the UI. What if I told you that a large percentage of the application's code is dedicated to how it looks on different screens, devices and OS versions? That is true for any program, be it a utility, a web-browsing app or a social media client, which means that the engineers at AVB have put in a large amount of time and effort into making sure that your phone's UI looks good. As a result, all the fixes, tweaks and improvements that you would expect to find are here. The latest UI enhancements range from an easier access to the preferences menu to the introduction of a configurable back arrow button and a new status bar that pops up after each menu. A lot of work has been put into these enhancements, so you are assured of a smooth transition from the previous UI to the one found in Google Play. The app's UI is shown through widgets, which are a series of small, square icons that can be placed anywhere on the homescreen. The widgets can be re-arranged and placed according to your needs, and there are also hundreds of pre-made layouts to choose from. With the new status bar, you don't need to hover your mouse over the application's icon to get the app's version, and update notifications, and up to date information about the application's version. And here is where the app gets interesting, and where it could improve. The update notifications can be disabled, but you can still see the information. Another issue is that you have to get up from your reclining chair and grab your phone to get the most current info. It would be great if the update info was shown in a notification bar, and not on a button or an icon. The app is packed with features, and some of them are unavailable or hidden unless 09e8f5149f
