Field of the Invention This invention relates generally to computer graphics systems, and more particularly to a system and method of simultaneously rendering and zooming an image in a graphics system with additional zooming capability. 2. Description of the Related Art Computer graphics systems are commonly used for displaying graphical representations of objects on a two-dimensional video display screen. Current computer graphics display systems provide highly detailed representations and are used in a variety of applications. A computer graphics display system typically includes a geometry accelerator, a rasterizer, a frame buffer and a display controller. The geometry accelerator receives vertex information from a host computer for rendering objects on the display screen. Vertices and other data defining the objects to be rendered are converted by the geometry accelerator into primitives, such as points, lines, and polygons, which are defined by the host computer. These primitives are rendered or drawn by the geometry accelerator in accordance with the results of a zooming operation, which is defined by the type of object being represented. The rasterizer then renders the primitives that the geometry accelerator has generated. The rasterizer determines which vertices of the primitives are inside a visible screen area. The rasterizer then projects the vertices that are inside the visible screen area to the display screen, and renders edges and lines between the vertices. The geometry accelerator may perform additional operations, such as lighting, blending, fogging, and other functions. The final output of the geometry accelerator is a set of pixels defining an image frame. The frame buffer stores the set of pixels defining the image frame. The frame buffer may be a static random access memory (SRAM), which is an array of memory cells that are accessed randomly, or a dynamic random access memory (DRAM), which is an array of memory cells that are accessed in a serial order. The number of memory cells used to store the image frame may be determined by the number of 77a5ca646e
